There is a saying "Where there is will, there is a way." It means if you have the will to achieve, you can always find or make a way, but the question here is how willing are you? You might know the way, but what if it is out of your comfort zone? How will you prove yourself if you are shy and hesitant? If you want to win, you need to have enough will power to achieve that. The problem does not simply lie in the coyness; it is also the fear that lies within. Fear of rejection, ignorance, feeling of incompetence, and lack of confidence – these elements build up all because of the very habit of stepping back when it comes to prove you. This is one of the major problems why introvert people are not able to bring out their talent to the world. They might seem like a minor problem to extroverts and outgoing people, but it is one major step to take to those who are not. Some of them are lucky when someone else recognizes their potential and encourages them, show them the way, and fully supports them whereas the rest of them are just in hiding and keeping their skills to themselves.

When we want to have fun, one thing that definitely comes to our mind is having fun with friends. Gone are the days when one used to think of playing board games, flying kites, hanging out with friends as fun. For many, the first thing when the idea of fun comes to mind is to drink. It is surprising how closely people associate drinking with their lives. People plan night outs to get drunk. Is it just a trend or does it become easier gel with people once you are drunk? Or it is just that people are not happy with their lives and their conscious self wants the tacit support of alcohol? I am not against drinking. Like everything, drinking too has its pros and cons. In moderate quantity, there may be some benefits. But then, what is the limit? Is it acceptable that your close one drinks and speaks something that rubs you of your dignity? Is it acceptable that you drink so much that you become handicapped, and you disturb others nearby. Is it acceptable that you break an innocent life just because you are drunk for the fun of it. Drinking and smoking are twin problems of today's world. Many teenagers smoke just to give others impression that they are no more young people, or rather they are fully grown up or adult.
